over a linking bridge.

His arrest was followed by a full-scale disturbance. Scuffles broke out and a military policeman shot and killed a Gordon Highlander corporal. His bullets also injured a passing French woman.

More than a thousand angry British, Australian and New Zealand troops chased the MPs who fled before army reinforcements were brought in to quell the mutiny.

It all ended in tears. Many of the mutineers were charged, one was sentenced to death and shot in Boulogne, and three others were given 10 years penal servitude, while others were jailed for a year with hard labour.

They were interesting times. Dover has no military now.
